

NOTE.

Daffodils may be successfully grown in any good garden soil, but thrive best in one which while not too light in character, is naturally supplied with abundant moisture and well drained.

The ground should be deeply worked, and allowed to stand for a few weeks to settle down before planting.

The bulbs should be planted in February and March, at a depth of from three to four inches, according to the size of the bulbs. The best results are obtained from early planting.

Lifting should be deferred until the foliage has completed its growth and died off. The practice of cutting off the leaves while still in a growing condition soon after flowering is very injurious to the bulbs.

Grown under very favourable conditions as to soil and climate, the "Heathcote" Daffodil Bulbs will be found to be sound and healthy and of good size.
